

Letter from General T[homas]
Wentworth, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, to Henry Pelham; 10 November 1745.

Newcastle, Nov. the 10th

1745

S^r,

I was this morning honour'd with yours of the 7th and as I am persuaded that you must not be a little anxious for what concerns us, I write by the post, the Marshall not designing to send away an express 'till to morrow or the day following -

By our freshest intelligence, the Rebels were very near Carlisle, but I conceive it must only be meant of one of their partys, as it is pretty certain that a considerable body of them, were two days ago at or near Dumfries, which town lying some miles west of Carlisle, I can not easily account for their going so far out of their way, if their real design is to move southward, indeed tis said th^t they have been oblig'd to take that road for the more easy conveyance of their artillery. Most of the accounts we receive of the Rebels, are, I think, not altogether to be depended upon, as they are but too often dictated by the fears of those who are employ'd to observe their motions; a Clergyman upon the Western border, lately signify'd by letter that he had himself seen 2000 upon their march, which number a second letter writ by the same person a few hours after, reduc'd to sixty.

From what I can judge (as I mention'd in my last) their numbers can not exceed 8000 in Arms; allowing them to be all Highlanders (which is not the case) and even such formidable Heroes, as they are describ'd by certain persons on almost every occasion, I shou'd not be under the least apprehensions on that account; cou'd we but bring our people fairly up to them in health and in vigour - our greatest difficulty will arise from the want of subsistence, w^h will be unavoidable if we march towards the Western Moors; as we have no Magazines, and as little grain &c. is produc'd in th^t barren soil that, in my humble opinion, can be the only obstacle w^h will prevent us seeking them instantly, as soon as it shall be certainly known what route they have taken.

To morrow a Council of Warr is to sit, for, I suppose, determining what measures to take, the results of w^h you will know by the next opportunity.

I am, S^r

With great truth,

Your most faithfull
& obliged humble serv^t

J. Wentworth

P. S.

Gen^l Handasyde is on Tuesday to march to Edinburgh, the two Reg^{ts} of foot who are to accompany him, have no less than 300 sick.

Newcastle Nov: the 10th

1790

I was this morning honour'd with yours of the 7th, and as I am persuaded that you must not be a little anxious for what concerns us, I write by the post, the Marchal not designing to send away an express till to morrow or the day following -

By our freshest intelligence, the Rebels were very near Carlisle, but I conceive it must only be meant of one of their parties, as it's pretty certain that a considerable body of them, were two days ago at or near Dumfries, which town lying some miles west of Carlisle, I can not easily account for their going so far out of their way, if their real design is to move southward; indeed 'tis said if they have been oblig'd to take that road for the more easy conveyance of their

Artillery -

Most of y^e accounts we receive of y^e Rebels, are, I think, not altogether to be depended upon, as they are but too often dictated by y^e fears of those who are employ'd to observe their motions; a Kerygoner upon the Western border, lately signify'd by letter that he had himself seen 2000 upon their march, which number a second letter writ by y^e same person a few hours after, reduc'd to sixty.

From what I can judge (as I mention'd in my last) their numbers can not exceed 8000 in Arms; allowing them to be all Highlanders (w^{ch} is not y^e case) and ever such formidable Heroes, as they are describ'd by certain persons on almost every occasion, I shou'd not be under the least apprehensions on that account; could we but bring our people fairly up to them in health and in vigour, our greatest difficulty will arise from a want of subsistence, it will be unavoidable if we march toward the Western Moors; as we have no Magazines, and as little grain &c. is produced in the Barren soil; that, in my humble opinion, could be only obtained if it will present us seeking them unobtainably, as soon as it shall be certainly known what route they have taken.

To-morrow a Council of War is to sit, for I suppose, determining what measures to take, the result of which you will know by the next opportunity.

I am, Sir

With great truth
Your most faithful & obliged humble servant

151
Gen^l Henderson is on Friday to march to Edinburgh, the two best
of foot who are to accompany him, have
no less than 300 sick.